I once went to London. As you might know, London is one of those places filled with culture. I visited an Indian restaurant to get a literal taste of the different cultures in London, wasn't very good though, but that's because I generally don't like Indian food. I went to the National Gallery where you can see several famous paintings like the Sunflowers from Vincent van Gogh. Other musea I visited were the British Museum and the National History Museum. Believe me, if you could spent a whole week in the British Museum you still wouldn't be able to see every exhibition. And the National History Museum is very amusing, even for people who don't like musea, it's comparable to NEMO here in the Netherlands. At the end of my trip I had seen all the clichés of course, such as the Tower of London, the Tower Bridge, Buckingham Palace where the queen lives and some amusing sights such as the M&M store and the Lego store at Leicester Square next to a statue of William Shakespeare. As you can see there are several things you can do during a trip: visit restaurants, explore the city's culture, visit a museum or typical tourist attractions.

Did any of you ever go to a big city?
Where did you go?
What did you see?
